We reported a case of eosinophilic gastroenteritis (EGE) with acute abdomen and respiratory failure. A 35-year-old woman was admitted to our hospital because of acute abdomen and respiratory failure. After laparotomy and extensive laparoscopy, she was diagnosed as having acute perforated appendicitis, pancreatitis, and ascites. She was transferred to the intensive care unit (ICU). In the ICU, she developed severe abdominal pain and abdominal fullness. Gastroscopy revealed no abnormality in the stomach and intestines.

Esophagoscopy revealed a circular ulcer located in the middle of the esophagus and biopsy from the ulcer revealed inflammatory changes with infiltration of eosinophils. She was diagnosed as having EGE. After a four-day course of prednisolone, she was discharged from the ICU without any problems. Filling dead time in child health center appointments. A study was done to demonstrate the effectiveness of a one-half-time, one-hour, school nurse-directed follow-up clinic (FC) for children enrolled in a health maintenance organization (HMO) for children. The results of the FC were compared to usual care (UC). Included in the FC were parents of a random sample of 552 children enrolled in the HMO, while the UC group consisted of all eligible children enrolled during that time period. Participants of the FC had a significantly greater mean score (8.03) on a self-reported internal health locus of control than the UC group (5.63). When providers, cost, and potential adverse effects were considered, it was determined that FC for children in the HMO could be a viable means for providing follow-up care to children enrolled in the HMO.
